24 Emerging UA Leaders Selected for Academic Leadership Institute

The newest cohort of the Academic Leadership Institute includes 24 of the UA’s future campus leaders. The 2017-2018 fellows[1] will start sessions in August.

The Academic Leadership Institute, a partnership between the Office of the Provost[2] and the Division of Human Resources[3], is a yearlong professional development program in which current and emerging campus leaders participate in discussions and workshops to help them develop their leadership skills.

The eighth cohort of the Academic Leadership Institute includes academic and administrative department heads, associate and assistant deans, and other emerging leaders, who represent many campus departments, colleges and offices like the School of Anthropology, the Eller College of Management, Steward Observatory, Residence Life and more.

Nicholas Sweeton, executive director of Residence Life and University Housing, and part of the newest cohort, thinks that being part of the program will help him align the goals of the area that he oversees with the goals of the overall University.

"I believe ALI will help me understand in greater detail the forces that shape the University, and in turn influence how decisions are made," Sweeton said. "ALI will also help me build my reputation on campus and form deeper connections with other participants."

Marla Franco, director of Assessment and Research in the Division of Student Affairs and Enrollment Management, Academic Initiatives and Student Success, is currently leading the efforts towards preparing the UA to achieve the federally recognized status of Hispanic Serving Institution and says that there couldn't be a more perfect time for her to experience the Academic Leadership Institute so that she's prepared for working alongside stakeholders and UA leaders.

"Cultivating strong partnerships with others and building networks of support and influence will be so important to the work that's about to happen," Franco said. "

A recommendation letter from a director, dean or department head is required in applying for the program.

Thomas Miller, vice provost for faculty affairs and co-head of the Institute with Allison Vaillancourt, vice president of business affairs and human resources, says the process is competitive due to the fact that applicants have "already been identified by their heads, directors and deans as outstanding candidates for the program."

With a large number of faculty and campus leaders getting ready to retire, the program will help prepare successors for those positions, Miller said.

"The next generation of faculty and staff leaders needs to be prepared to advance interdisciplinary innovations to respond to a wide range of changes, including the demographic shifts that will make minorities a majority in Arizona within a decade, the economic shifts that require increased attention to applied research and business partnerships, and instructional innovations that include online and active learning reforms," Miller said. "These transformations call for creative and engaged leadership at all levels, and ALI is vital to meeting that need."

During the program, participants undergo individual assessments and attend interactive workshops, informative presentations and networking opportunities. Fellows also develop plans for the year based on feedback they receive from a survey taken by their co-workers evaluating fellows' leadership qualities.

Besides the leadership training, one of the long-term benefits participants experience after the program are the networking connections made with colleagues across campus, which allows for more interdisciplinary collaboration.

"I'm looking forward to the networking opportunities, but more than that, I'm hoping for real connections and shared vision with other UA leaders," said Christopher Scott, director and research professor at the Udall Center for Studies in Public Policy. "Together, there's very little we can't achieve."
